

CHANNEL OPTIMIZATION

SOCIAL MEDIA ENGAGEMENT

Managing your social media accounts

Most consumers would not want to be without Web 2.0 channels such as Twitter or Facebook – also when it comes to maintaining contact with companies. However, in online social networks, customers are not only consumers but also opinion leaders. Thus, a professional management of these channels becomes more and more important.

According to a 2013 survey on social networks conducted by the industry association BITKOM, over three-quarters of all Internet users in Germany are registered with at least one social network; and two-thirds actively use one. They most frequently log on to Facebook, with 56 percent using it actively. This is an eleven percent increase compared to the results two years ago. Facebook and similar social networks are also platforms on which consumers share the experiences they have had with products and services. As a result, online dialogue in social networks has become a critical success factor for companies. Whether online or on the conventional hotline, customers expect service from a company.

A company Facebook profile or Twitter account offer considerable advantages to you and your customers. The added value from the consumer point of view is obvious: Without time and place constraints, customers can select a channel free of charge and exchange their concerns, opinions or experience with likeminded individuals. ↘

SOCIAL MEDIA MANAGEMENT FOR A GERMAN AIRLINE

Our employees have been managing the Facebook and Twitter accounts of a German airline since April 2013. For example, they respond to all posts and tweets submitted by customers and potential customers who tell others about their in-flight experiences, or their experiences with the service center.

Due to the high visibility of social media communication, quality is also paramount here. Quality assurance measures include a security loop in which response posts are checked by a second person before they are published. If necessary, we directly contact our client's respective department to clarify any specific points.

The employees who provide this service are not only extremely knowledgeable and experienced, but they also enjoy working with social media. They have also received special training, since the communication rules in social networks differ from e-mail etiquette; users are addressed by their first names, and the overall tone is kept informal – though always professional. We hide posts that do not comply with netiquette. The day-to-day work is facilitated by a workflow tool that can cope with the requirements of large customer service organizations.

The result: Since Majorel started managing the airline's Facebook profile, the number of "likes" has increased by over 430 percent.
